One of the most complex houses, for its size, Stonehaven is, basically of stone, two storeys, three bays, facing the Big Gunpowder valley, slightly west of north, hereinafter called north. Extending south behind its easterly end is a two storey stone rear wign of contemporaneous construction, two bays in length. A two storey wood wing extends west from the rear wing, and a one storey wood section fills the space between the two storey wood wing and the front stone portion. However, the rear wing's roof is symmetrical above the stone portion and approximately eight feet of the wood portion; indeed, the stone section of the rear wing has its west wall but one storey high, while its east wall is two storeys in height, bonded uniformly to the east end wall of the front section.

Coinciding, approximately, with the westerly limits of the rear wing's roof is a brick pier, one storey in height, exposed inside and out, interrupting the south wall. Aligned with the pier, next to the stone front portion of this complex house, is a brick wall, one storey in height, approximately one short bay in length. A beam in the second floor construction carries the second storey structure.

The front section of the house has flush end chimneys. At the south end of the rear wing is a large brick chimney, partly within the wing, and serving a fireplace in its first storey, but partly outside the limits of the wing, and serving a brick fireplace on the outside face, as though one woom were missing.

The principal or north elevation of this house is not perfectly symmetrical. A door is in the middle bay, and each flanking bay has a 6/6 window. Blinds are missing. Lintels are large, roughly shaped field-stone. Inside are two rooms, the westerly room being two bays in length, the easterly room one bay in length. Only the easterly one has a fire-place, with a mantel composed of moulded pilasters supporting a paneled frieze. The west chimney is a single flue, apparently commencing in the second storey. Windows are without interior trim, and there is no chair rail. The stair rises in a straight run between the easterly front room and the rear wing from east, up toward the west. There is no stone wall between the front section and the rear wing.

In the attic, straight sawn rafters are half-kapped and pegged in the front section. In the rear wing, over both the stone portion and a small part of the wood portion, log rafters are mitered. Attic floor joists in the rear wing are log, reused material.

The stone walled cellar extends under the whole house. The front portion is conventional, without mystery. A framed hole under the stair indicates that a cellar stair once descended under the principal stair, but access to the cellar, is, today, via a stair which was, probably, an exterior stair, now enclosed in the latest portion of the rear wing. The cellar of the rear section is slightly smaller than the actual foundations, walls, suggesting that it was dug after the foundations, and the structures above, were built.

Nothing positively earlier than ca. 1840 is visible, including the general character of the oldest existing forms, and details. Much of the interior is of the 20th century. The 1798 Federal Direct Tax records a 1½ storey stone house, measuring 25 by 25 feet, not indicated in the standing structure today. The existing stone front section measures approximately 19 by 33 feet; the stone portion of its rear wing measures approximately 16 by 17 feet; with its westerly extension under its basic roof it measures approximately 24 by 17 feet.

Superficial examination proves no definite sequence in construction. One may conjecture that the two storey stone front section had a contemporaneous rear wing with a two storey east wall, a one storey west wall, and a shed roof spanning between them. The stair may have risen from west up to east, originally, to arrive at the second floor near the east wall when the wing was two storeys in height. At a relatively early date, perhaps in the second half of the 19th century, the wing was widened and raised, with a new roof structure covering the whole. Of course it may have been a conventional two storey wing, with the upper half of its west wall removed to re-plan the second floor. In the 20th century it was further lengthened toward the west, the brick pier and wall being built to carry the wood extension which then had most of its first storey west wall removed. Additional structure probably existed south of the house, to include the exterior fireplace.

Although an antique character remains, obviously the house has seen extensive alterations, which have obliterated positive superficial evidence of its original and subsequent stages. Only with systematic, reverse-chronological removal of finishes and construction could positive conjectures be made.

West of the house stands a stone smokehouse, 13 feet square with a pyramidal roof; beneath it is a cellar, accessible from the outside.
